thing similar on the internet, which got me wondering if there was anything like that available," McMillan said of the flipper. "The guys up at SRT came up with a prototype and put it together with no cost to me besides the actual Mako flipper."

The prosthetic has a carbon fiber wrapped piece of Styrofoam at the attachment nearest the leg. A pole then extends downward so that McMillan is able to affix a swimming flipper, affording him the ability to swim again.

"I was never much of a swimmer before the accident," McMillan admitted. "After getting this though, I can see how much it helps me to regain some of the strength I have lost. I know I'll never get a lot of it back, but when I first started with this flipper, I could only go three laps at the YMCA pool. Now, I can go for a full 12 laps."

Taking it all in, McMillan said it is easy to remain bitter after the accident. "After three years, and plenty of time in the hospital, you have plenty of time to sit and think about what happened," McMillan said. "At first you really want to ask why me, and to a degree you still do. Now, I just hope the other driver was able to learn something from this. Hopefully, by raising awareness as to what can happen when texting and driving, someone else doesn't have to go through something like this."
